3. Imagine for a moment that a woman comes to you for help. She does not mention any trauma. She talks about how jumpy she is all the time, her inability to concentrate or sleep, and intrusive thoughts that constantly distract her. You notice her pressured speech. Now imagine that you are worn out, tired, and emotionally drained. Without getting the full story, this client could easily be misdiagnosed. The presenting symptoms could have a number of axial diagnoses, but it may take some effort to get to the right story of trauma. What would happen if this client, who really is suffering from PTSD, is mistakenly labeled with a personality disorder because the therapist is unable to see the situation clearly, and only reacts to the behaviors? That client could be injured for life with such a label, and run the risk of never receiving appropriate care!
When I was a young counselor just out of school, I took a job at an alternative school. I provided crisis intervention and behavioral therapy to children who were unable to succeed in normal educational environments. One of my clients was a six-year-old girl who had been repeatedly sexually abused and had been bounced around foster homes with her aggressive outbursts. After one particularly bad day of her active flashbacks, I found myself sitting in my clinical supervisor's office in tears.
