Burnout, Trauma, and Compassion Satisfaction

Burnout, secondary trauma, and compassion fatigue are not exactly the same things, and it's helpful to be able to distinguish among them. Secondary trauma is the reaction to dealing with other people's situations, such as my reaction to my six-year-old client. Burnout is related to the job environments in which we work, and the stresses attached to those jobs and requirements, like paperwork or poor supervision or support. When burnout and STS are both present, an individual is said to be experiencing compassion fatigue (CF). There is also a third factor in CF—something called compassion satisfaction (CS). Stamm explains this phenomenon as “being satisfied with doing the work of caring” (2002, p. 110). In other words, the gratification of helping others makes the strains of the work worth it. It is not uncommon to see social workers continue in their jobs after physical or psychological injury, or to find them reluctant to leave the field despite personal stress. The caring that we give to the world is both the greatest risk and the greatest protective factor from long-term trauma (Figley, 2002; Saakvitne & Pearlman, 1996; Stamm, 2002).
