3. For example, when “Steven” participated in a later class, I was ready to steer him in a different direction. He was an LMSW who had been a computer specialist in his first profession. (Many clinical social workers have had previous careers.) Although he came to class to learn how to build a practice, he didn’t quite seem to fit. During the course of our work, it became clear that he loved working with computers and was reluctant to give that up. Together, as the class went on, we discovered a possible alternative niche for him, one that would incorporate both his clinical and technical skills. He decided indeed to build a practice—but not the kind that we had been talking about in class. Steven’s idea was to develop Web sites for clinicians. And he did so quite successfully, using the marketing principles we had discussed in class.
