What about when racism is coming from the clients, rather than from the social worker or the society at large toward the client?

One of the components of the WKU MSW program on the micro level is to “understand boundaries,” says Starks. “If clients are racist, you have to remember that that’s not why the client is there. It’s really tough for a new social worker to maintain boundaries, and the client doesn’t need to address antiracism.” In order to inculcate that lesson, Starks uses role playing and encourages the practice of consultation and supervision, especially for new social workers, who “need someone to process it with, to learn how to self-monitor,” she says. “Often, people of color don’t have that power of racism, though they can be bitter. You have to validate their experiences as part of a system that creates that and help them move to healing on a micro level.”

n facing a racist client, says Melendez, the therapist has to “have a tough skin.”
